When a business agrees that a customer does not fit within your core, it doesn't necessarily mean that the customer is bad. It just means that the customer is not a good fit for your business. The business is not a good fit for you, and the customer is not a good fit for the business. When this happens, it's best to let the customer go and find a new customer who is a better fit for your business.

Abstract: The empirical study of self-management in 51 executives from Chinese private firms is first offered. In this context, the study reveals that self-management is a 3-dimensional construct: (1) self-management in the work domain, (2) self-management in the family domain, and (3) self-management in the social domain. The results of the study indicate that self-management in the work domain is positively related to self-management in the family domain and self-management in the social domain. The results also indicate that self-management in the family domain is positively related to self-management in the social domain.
