Comprehension

One thing is true: that not just properly trained young scientists graduate from a program. Proper training can be given to other people while they remain in universities, but I think the benefits are so small that we can best use universities to supply the students and programs that will develop them. I agree that the present is not training well enough the high-quality individuals already available in our faculty ranks, but this means sending us to graduate schools to acquire "the best of the best" through our own or another school's (or the program's) selection and then to continue participating in the long program. Others, a smaller, more limited number, will be able to become "top scientists" on their own, but I think that is a small number.
