Religiosity is connected with the greater variety of religious forms. Being religious and important institutions (such as churches or mosques) shape institutions and religious life and contribute to the social, cultural, economic, political, and environmental development of the community. Religion is not only a social institution but also a political force. It is a social institution that is used in the attempt to bring individuals and nations to the socially religious performance and to the compliance, observed and changing and maintaining. In addition, most of religious behavior occurs within institutional contexts. The inner dimensions of religious faith are experiences, beliefs, and values that are related to one spiritually. This is part of what is called religion, that it may occur in particular, institutionalized ways. Indeed that ideal and social dimensions of religious institutions.
