In only my second Theatrical experience since before I can remember, I found myself seated in the Malcom Field theater of Saginaw Valley State University. The Malcom Theater is a very well designed stage for this theatrical performance. It was just large enough to express all of this plays theatrical elements, yet not too large to cause distraction. For about the price of a typical movie ticket I received an hour and ten minutes of comical entertainment. The production presented on October 14 at seven o'clock was a theatrical performance called The Elves And The Shoemaker. An adaptation of the classic Grimm's fairy tale.

The author of the The Elves And The Shoemaker renown author Ric Averill, who also known for writing several other big name shows such as Frankenstein. Averill's experience in play writing is shown throughout this dramatic themed children's play. I believe The Elves And The Shoemaker's script was written very well to appeal to its designated audience. It is obvious this play was written for a younger audience. With themes based around loss, struggle, acceptance, and new beginnings all of which are presented from a child's perspective. The major conflict of the play being the struggle to make shoes for a deadline.

The Elves And The Shoemaker Short Summary

I believe the writer choose a Shoe making craft because it would be simple enough for the younger audience to get into. It is consideration like that in the script that forms its overall intentions. While the dominate tone of the play was serious, there were more than a couple comedic lines. Most of the plays comedic relief ironically came from the main character of whom arguably was having the roughest time. I believe the author implemented the main character having the most struggle as well as being the "funny character" as a tactic to engage the younger audience into this story.

A tactic I feel took a very good direction. Myself being twenty years old was engaged in what this character would do next. My only complaint about the script was the presence of apparent dead spots. A couple segments in the production which gave you that feeling of wanting something else to happen, mostly in the beginning. I think these spots were only present in the attempt
