Artful Defense

A martial art is a system of self-defense that can also be a competitive sport. People practice martial arts for physical fitness, mental discipline, spiritual development, and other reasons. Some martial arts, such as tai chi (ty chee), also teaches healing skills, including deep breathing and meditation. Most martial arts practiced today, including judo, karate, and jujitsu, have their origins in China, Korea, or Japan. In modern times, Asian and American movies have increased the popularity of martial arts. This essay looks at two popular forms of martial arts: taekwondo and kung fu.

Week 1

Error Summary

Taekwondo is a Korean art of unarmed combat. The Korean word taekwondo means "method of kicking or punching." This modern sport has ancient roots but was named only in 1955. Thirty million people worldwide practice this popular sport. Students of Taekwondo learn to deliver fast, powerful and high kicks, sometimes while spinning or jumping. They also learn to strike with their fists and to block, or avoid, an opponent's kick or hit. When partners spar, or practice together, they kick or strike without completely making contact. That way, they don't hurt each other. Individuals can also practice by using a target.
