

Hooke's Law

Testing Hooke's Law

The spring constant is a measure of the stiffness of a spring. It is defined as the force per unit extension.

We can test Hooke's Law by measuring the extension of a spring for different forces. The force is applied by hanging masses of known weight from the spring. The extension is measured by a ruler.

By plotting a graph of force against extension, we can determine the spring constant. The graph should be a straight line passing through the origin. The gradient of the line is the spring constant.

Graphs of force against extension for different springs will have different gradients. The stiffer the spring, the steeper the gradient.

We can also use the graph to determine the work done in stretching the spring. The area under the line is the work done.

Work Done and the Spring Constant

Work done is the energy transferred when a force is applied to an object and it moves through a distance.

When a spring is stretched, work is done on it. The work done is stored as elastic potential energy in the spring.

Work done is calculated as the product of the force applied and the distance moved in the direction of the force.

For a spring, the work done is equal to the elastic potential energy stored in the spring.

The work done is also equal to the area under the force-extension graph.
