As mentioned above, the 1994 report contains two tables of results on the relative measures of measures of the exchange rate volatility index and other indicators of globalization. Table 10, particularly, shows the comparison of the volatility index with other measures of globalization. The table shows that the volatility index is significantly higher than other measures of globalization. This suggests that the volatility index is a more reliable measure of globalization than other measures. The table also shows that the volatility index is significantly higher than other measures of globalization. This suggests that the volatility index is a more reliable measure of globalization than other measures.
