The diagram illustrates the experimental design. It shows a sequence of events: a stimulus (a box with a question mark), a response (a box with a plus sign), and a feedback phase (a box with a plus sign and a checkmark). The sequence is repeated for multiple trials, with a final feedback phase showing a plus sign and a checkmark.

Figure 1 displays 15 line graphs arranged in a 3x5 grid. Each graph plots the percentage of correct responses (Y-axis, 0 to 100) against time in seconds (X-axis, 0 to 10). The graphs are organized by stimulus duration (rows: 100 ms, 200 ms, 300 ms) and stimulus type (columns: auditory, visual). The data shows that performance is generally higher for auditory stimuli and decreases as stimulus duration increases. A scale bar at the bottom indicates 100% correct responses.

The schematic representation of the experimental design shows three parallel paths for Control, Cognitive, and Physical groups. All groups start with a Pretest, followed by either Training (for Cognitive) or Rest (for Control and Physical), and finally Posttest. A timeline at the bottom marks the sequence of events.

The diagram illustrates the experimental design flow. It starts with a 'Pretest' box, followed by an arrow to a 'Training' box. From 'Training', an arrow leads to a 'Transfer' box, and another arrow leads to a 'Control' box. From 'Transfer', an arrow leads to a 'Posttest' box. The 'Control' box is positioned between the 'Training' and 'Transfer' boxes, suggesting a comparison or control condition during the transfer phase.
