Abstract

Background: Studies using computerized systems for monitoring and control of anesthesia have shown that the use of such systems can reduce the risk of anesthesia-related errors. However, the use of such systems is not widespread, and the reasons for this are not well understood. One of the main barriers to the widespread use of such systems is the lack of evidence that they are safe and effective. This is because most studies of such systems have been small and short-term, and have not included a comparison with a control group. In addition, many studies have not included a assessment of the impact of such systems on the workload of the anesthesia provider. This paper reports on a large, multi-center, randomized controlled trial of a computerized anesthesia monitoring and control system, the Anesthesia Workstation (AW), in a large teaching hospital. The study was designed to evaluate the safety and effectiveness of the AW, and to assess its impact on the workload of the anesthesia provider. The study included 100 patients who were scheduled for elective surgery, and 100 anesthesia providers who were trained in the use of the AW. The patients were randomly assigned to receive anesthesia using either the AW or a standard manual system. The anesthesia providers were also randomly assigned to use either the AW or the standard manual system. The primary outcome of the study was the incidence of anesthesia-related errors. Secondary outcomes included the time to detect and respond to a low oxygen saturation, the time to detect and respond to a low tidal volume, and the time to detect and respond to a low respiratory rate. The study found that the incidence of anesthesia-related errors was significantly lower in the AW group than in the standard manual group. The time to detect and respond to a low oxygen saturation, the time to detect and respond to a low tidal volume, and the time to detect and respond to a low respiratory rate were also significantly lower in the AW group than in the standard manual group. The study also found that the use of the AW did not increase the workload of the anesthesia provider. In conclusion, the study found that the AW is a safe and effective system for monitoring and controlling anesthesia, and that its use does not increase the workload of the anesthesia provider. This study provides strong evidence that the AW is a safe and effective system for monitoring and controlling anesthesia, and that its use does not increase the workload of the anesthesia provider. This study provides strong evidence that the AW is a safe and effective system for monitoring and controlling anesthesia, and that its use does not increase the workload of the anesthesia provider.
