

My personal journey in education. Connecting my story to educational theory. Growing as a student I started school at the age of five, and I had no interest in sitting down and listening to anyone. I loved learning to read, but I really just wanted to outside playing and running around. The teachers always sat me up front because I would distract the other students. It was not that I was a bad kid, I just didn't fit into the model very well. Don't get me wrong, I had wonderful teachers who taught me great foundations, it was just the sitting still all day that bothered me, and I still think of that sensation now when I morph into a boring talking head in front of one of my classes. I did not like school very much, and I thought that meant I did not like learning. Boy, was I wrong. Then when I was 10 years old I became a Constructivist, I didn't know it at the time, but I was exploring a way of learning that I would not know the definition of until I was well into the 21st Century. How I became as Constructivist is a long drawn out story of self-discovery, but really it is all about: Drums! When I was ten, I started to play the drums. I spent most of my time in front of a tape or record player; I upgraded (downgraded?) to CD around 1993. I was constructing my own learning in a way which made sense to me. I didn't know it at the time, but I developed relative pitch during this period because not only did I learn drums by listening to music and copying what I heard, I also transferred this love of learning to guitar, and later on to bass. It was this love of finding a hobby which helped me make it through junior and senior high. I was able to join school bands and it gave me a purpose and inspired me to go to class every day. In fact, I went from almost failing my junior high years to receiving scholarships at the end of my grad 12 year. I intended to keep learning as much as possible about music. In university, I was in a strict traditional lecture based classical music program, but I was spending my weekends playing various styles of rock music. I was reading music in the daytime, and "lifting" charts from the internet and from CDs in the nighttime. I was finding online communities which
