How do these results relate to the USF goal of 100 mph, which can produce a 10% ARI in change between the conventional, existing, 80- and 90- mph limits?

Answer: Electrical energy drawn from the USF grid may vary due to different charging station conditions, battery characteristics or power transmission system of your device being charged.

What current protection level would, say, a power bank show, when your device reaches maximum high-charging current (over 1 A) from the USF grid? Otherwise, what are current protection can be measured and what device is disconnected from the USF grid or leaving the loading mode?
