One thing is true: that not just properly trained young scientists get the most of a prize. First-prize went to an 18th-year-old girl while 19th-year-olds won second prize. And the females got 56 of our 100 "top five best new scientific ideas" prizes (third prize and beyond). These findings demonstrate again that young scientists are doing well without the little party hats and ribbons already available to them. Indeed, these girls are doing nothing at all but excellent work to improve "the future of the world" through science. We would have liked to do targeted interviews but cannot participate in this long game. (After a while, we had to move on to the fourth, fifth, and 100th prizes, so we had to choose our words.)
