It is worth noting that the letter writers acknowledged their agreement to take on a very specific challenge and the implications of that choice: a real reduction in smoking. Agreeing to this and choosing to take part in the challenge was clearly a conscious and voluntary action and hence a legitimate way to participate without creating any kind of opportunity cost for the tobacco growers and businesses affected. It was therefore not a matter of any individual's contribution to collective harm or of someone contributing to harmful opportunities provided for themselves and others by the tobacco industry. It was a matter of contributing to a different kind of harm.
