

ANSWERS AND EXPLANATIONS

Each time a person enters the room, the computer generates a number and then asks a randomly selected question from the question pool. It records the answer given. The data from all selected people are combined, and that combination makes an informed choice about whether to keep a person in the room. That person is randomly placed in the room or taken out of the room.

Because the population was not well defined, people could avoid the questionnaire, leading to a biased sample. For example, people could ignore the questionnaire and not return to the building, or people could avoid the building altogether. The problem is that the people who do return to the building are not necessarily the same people who do not return to the building.

The authors took a more sophisticated approach. An address book from 1990 and the census records for the building for 1990, including mailing records, showed which people lived in the building. The authors randomly selected a random sample of addresses from the address book, mailed a letter to that address, and then waited for the letter to come through the mail.

After all the letters had been sent and the letters had been returned, the authors waited for the letters to come back and then randomly selected a random sample of the letters that had been returned.

The authors then used a random sample of the letters that had been returned to select a random sample of the letters that had been returned. The authors then used a random sample of the letters that had been returned to select a random sample of the letters that had been returned.

The authors then used a random sample of the letters that had been returned.

The authors then used a random sample of the letters that had been returned.
