Abstract Psychological research has shown that people are more likely to help others when they are in a good mood. However, it is not clear whether this effect is due to a general increase in prosocial behavior or to a specific increase in helping behavior. The present study examined the effect of mood on helping behavior in a laboratory setting. Participants were assigned to either a good mood condition or a neutral mood condition. They then completed a series of tasks that required them to help others. Results showed that participants in the good mood condition were more likely to help others than participants in the neutral mood condition. This effect was specific to helping behavior and did not generalize to other prosocial behaviors. The findings suggest that mood can influence helping behavior in a specific way, but not in a general way.
