Abstract Background Despite the well-known importance of sleep, sleep problems remain understudied in research and practice in child and adolescent mental health. This study investigated parents' and adolescents' perceptions of sleep problems. Methods The sample included 100 parents and 100 adolescents who were referred to a pediatric mental health clinic for a variety of reasons. The adolescents' sleep problems were assessed using the Children's Sleep Questionnaire (CSQ), a validated measure of sleep problems in adolescents. The parents' perceptions of their child's sleep problems were assessed using the Parent Sleep Problems Questionnaire (PSPQ), a validated measure of parents' perceptions of their child's sleep problems. Results The adolescents' sleep problems were associated with their parents' perceptions of their child's sleep problems. The adolescents' sleep problems were also associated with their parents' perceptions of their child's mental health problems. Conclusions The findings of this study suggest that sleep problems are an important component of child and adolescent mental health.
