Abstract

Software Defined Networking (SDN) is a modern network architectural model that manages network traffic using software. SDN is a networking scenario that modifies the conventional network design by combining all control features into a single place and making all choices centrally. Controllers are the "brains" of SDN architecture since they are responsible for making control decisions and routing packets at the same time. The capacity for centralized decision-making on routing improves the performance of the network. SDN's growing functionality and uses have led to the development of many controller systems. Every SDN controller idea or design must prioritize the control plane since it is the most crucial part of the SDN architecture. This paper, present Dynamic Resource Allocation based on the Spiking Neural Network (DRASR) approach, which is responsible to distribute available resources among all slices justly according to the type of demand. The simulation results show that the benefit of the network throughput is about 98.8%.

1. Introduction

Because it is more controllable, dynamic, and cost-effective than traditional architecture, SDN is a strong network architecture that is best for high-bandwidth applications that change quickly [1]. The idea that a network's control operations should be kept distinct from its forwarding functions became the foundation of the SDN design. This would make it simpler to directly program the network control and abstract forwarding devices for services and network applications [2].

- Easy to program: Since the control function of the forwarding device has been taken away, the network's control operation can be directly programmed.
- Agile: The network administrator can change network traffic on the fly to meet different management needs since control is separated from the infrastructure underneath.
- Centralized management: Because the network's brain (controller) is logically centralized and appears as a single switch to the application and policy engines, it has a global view of the entire network.

Journalism Research that Matters Valérie Bélair-Gagnon, Nikki Usher, 2021 It is now well established that the long time economic model on which the news industry has relied is no longer sustainable Facebook Google and declining levels of popular trust in the media have been major contributors to this situation Simultaneously the closure of local media outlets across the country has left many areas without access to regional news compounded the distance between media and publics and further eroded civic engagement Despite the looming crisis in journalism a research practice gap plagues the news industry This book argues that an underappreciated factor in the news crisis is a potentially symbiotic relationship between journalism studies and the industry that it researches As this book contends scholars must think about their work in a public context and journalists too need to listen to media scholars and take the research that they do seriously Including contributions from journalists and academics Journalism Research That Matters offers journalists a guide on what they need to know and journalism scholars a call to action for what kind of research they can do to best help the news industry reckon with disruption The book looks at new research developments surrounding audience behavior social networks and journalism business models the challenges that scholars face in making their research available to the public and to journalists the financial survival of quality news and information and blind spots in the way that researchers and journalists do their work especially around race diversity and inequality A final section includes contributions from journalists about how researchers can better engage on the ground with newsrooms and media professionals
