NATURAL SELECTION and EVOLUTION 2

The following diagrams show black and white moths against (A) light-colored lichen in a forest and (B) soot-covered trees in a polluted forest.

(a) Which is likely to be favored in the forest?
(b) Explain the difference between the two moths in the forest, using the terms 'selective advantage'.

NATURAL SELECTION and EVOLUTION 26

The following phylogenetic tree shows the relatedness of three species X, Y and Z and is based on changes in the protein cytochrome C, common to all three species. Scientists have found that these changes occur at a rate of about 1% every 20 million years.

ANSWER

A bottleneck effect occurs when a population is drastically reduced, due to some event, such as a fire. Certain alleles are lost, and the genetic diversity of the population is reduced. This loss is not due to natural selection favoring certain alleles.

(a) Allopatric speciation.
(b) If two populations are considered subspecies, this means that while they might look quite different to each other, they are still capable of interbreeding and producing healthy, fertile offspring. They therefore still belong to the same species.
