

Shoes and a few accessories completed the outfit. Shoes were in the style of ballet slippers, very slim and low, finishing at the ankle. They could be made of silk, velvet or leather. Wooden or leather pads could be fitted underneath to protect them from water or mud. Dresses didn't have pockets, so the accessories, small handbags, known as reticules, were used to carry everyday essentials. Paper or silk fans added a touch of glamour.

Flower-strewn also became fashionable. Hair was worn up in a bun and pretty curls framed the face. The finishing touch was a bouquet in her hand. It was inappropriate not to wear one also, you were not, even though some women took the liberty of going without.

SEWING

Among much carried out in the home included mending shoes, children's clothes and clothes for people in need. In a letter dated 17 September 1790, Jane Austen proudly announced to her sister that she was the most useful and economical member in the making of Edward's dress. It was the custom to give small accessories such as hair ornaments or to embellish clothes with simple things like ribbon or flowers. For inspiration and to keep abreast of the latest trends, a number of magazines specialised in fashion, including The Lady's Magazine, The Belle Assemblée and The Gallery of Fashion.

For larger pieces, such as dresses or coats, a domestic or tailor was called in. Professionals used sheets of paper or fabric directly on the customer to draw the pattern for the garment. This was common practice and was so expressive. In one of her letters, Jane Austen mentions that she paid eight shillings for the two patterns (the trousers and the skirt). The main cost was the fabric. In Northanger Abbey, Henry Tilney is rather proud to explain that he has obtained a superb bargain for his new herring red Indian muslin of very good quality at a good price. His children could also be taken back and mended.

Men's fashions

Men's fashions moved away from that of previous years with a more streamlined, tailored style. Shirts were in knee and the neck was covered with a high collar. Different wigs or wigs were worn. Jackets, in light or dark blue, were cut short at the knee and most with a high collar. Breeches were longer and tighter, and gradually replaced trousers made of silk, wool or cotton. During the day, light colours were worn. After sunset, black was preferred in the evening. During the day, men wore knee high Phrygian caps or Wellington boots, which are shoes, and tall and light. In the evening, shoes were a must.

As for accessories, walking sticks, gloves or shoes... Finally, for the most part, the ideal accessory was the ideal accessory. Some people had, but top hats were the Shoppers by the shore, in a beautiful, public, long, narrow, narrow lane.

Many challenges were overcome in the past at the time of Jane Austen.
