

the side and the fuel outlet on the end. Serviceable filters consist of an assembly with a knurled cap that threads onto the filter bowl or base. The balance of the VRO2 equipped V motors either utilize a sealed plastic canister mounted literally inline (with a fuel line attaching to each end similar to how the serviceable filter is mounted on CV motors) or a spin-on type filter that is mounted to a bracket. The spin-on filters are used on most V8 engines and also usually function as a fuel/water separator. The plastic housing inline filters are generally only found on V4 and V6 models.

■ Because of the relative ease and relatively low expense of an inline filter (when compared with the time and hassle of a carburetor overhaul or the expense of a low) we encourage you to replace the filter at least annually.

Service varies slightly by filter type:

To replace a non-serviceable inline filter, release the hose clamps (they are usually equipped with spring-type clamps that are released by squeezing the tabs using a pair of pliers) and slide them back on the hose, past the raised portion of the filter inlet/outlet nipples. Once a clamp is released, position a small drain pan or a shop towel under the filter and carefully pull the hose from the nipple. Allow any fuel remaining in the filter and fuel line to drain into the drain pan or catch fuel with the shop towel. Repeat on the other side, noting which fuel line connects to which portion of the filter (for assembly purposes). Inline filters are usually marked with an arrow indicating fuel flow. The arrow should point towards the fuel line that runs to the motor (not the fuel tank).
