

LIMITATIONS OF USING THE GENERAL JOURNAL AND THE GENERAL LEDGER

The discussions in the previous chapters were limited to processing transactions recorded in the general journal and posted to the general ledger. This type of accounting system is satisfactory for introducing basic accounting procedures. However, this system would be inadequate for a business having even a moderate volume of transactions for some reasons:

- ✓ Only a limited number of transactions can be processed daily because only one person at any one time can introduce entries into the general journal.
- ✓ Transactions recorded in the general journal must be posted individually in the general ledger, resulting to a great deal of posting later.

To overcome these limitations, entities adopt an accounting system that incorporates either the use of the usual special journals (non-voucher) or the voucher system.

Also, the illustrations have utilized only one account of accounts receivable and another one for accounts payable. Entities that maintain accounts with numerous customers and creditors will find it burdensome to work with a general ledger containing a large number of customer and creditor accounts. Therefore, entities adopt an accounting system that uses control accounts in the general ledger and separate subsidiary ledgers to record and control the accounts of individual customers and creditors.

CONTROL ACCOUNTS AND SUBSIDIARY LEDGERS

When an entity keeps charges to and payments from all customers in a single accounts receivable account in the general ledger, the account in T-account form would appear as follows:

Accounts Receivable
38,000	9,000
3,000	4,000

Using this procedure, the entity can not easily bill or mail statements to customers, answer inquiries about individual customer balances, or make any collection efforts if it has only a single record showing total claims against all customers. The entity needs to know each customer's name and address, transaction dates, amounts billed and amounts received on account for each account receivable.

The problem can be partly solved by maintaining in the general ledger an account for each customer. The trial balance of such general ledger may appear as follows:

		Trial Balance
		Debit	Credit
Cash	P	131,300
Accounts Receivable-Customer A		3,000
Accounts Receivable-Customer B		7,000
Accounts Receivable-Customer C		8,000
Accounts Receivable-Customer D		10,000
All Other Assets		153,500
All Liabilities			P 35,500
Owner's Capital			250,000
Owner's Withdrawals		8,000
Revenue			54,500
All Expenses		19,200
	P	340,000	P 340,000

This approach has limitations too. The general ledger becomes unreasonably large when hundreds of customers' accounts are involved. With thousands of customers, it becomes unworkable.

This problem can be best addressed using an accounts receivable control account in the general ledger, and individual customer accounts in a subsidiary ledger. Under this approach, the general ledger is kept to a manageable size, and a detailed record of transactions with individual customers exist in the subsidiary ledger. It is a controlling account in the sense that its balance should equal the total of the individual account balances in the
