

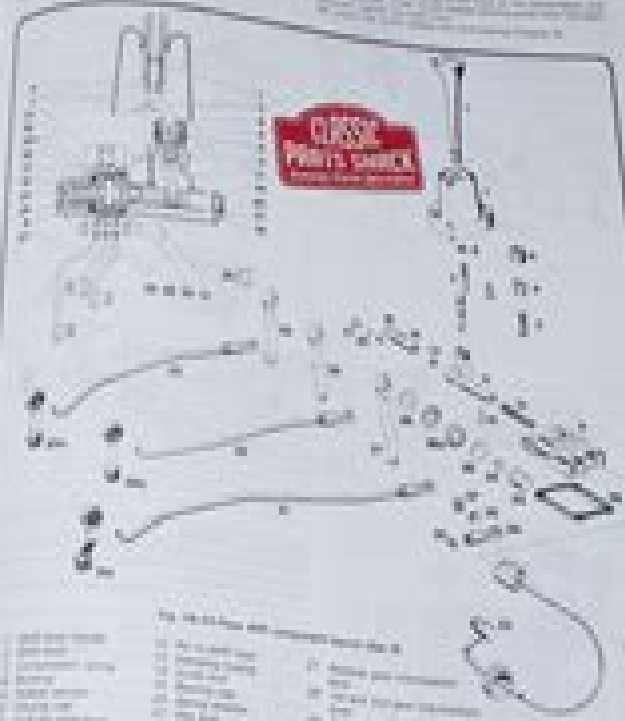

Fig. 18-10. Detail of the winding mechanism of the watch movement.

The winding mechanism of the watch movement is a complex assembly of parts. It includes the winding crown, the winding wheel, the winding pinion, the winding gear, the winding ratchet, the winding click, the winding spring, and the winding lever. The winding mechanism is responsible for winding the mainspring, which stores the energy needed to power the watch movement. The winding mechanism is located on the back of the watch case, and it is accessible through the winding crown. The winding mechanism is a critical component of the watch movement, and it must be carefully designed and assembled to ensure reliable operation.

Fig. 18-11. Detail of the winding mechanism of the watch movement, showing the winding crown and the winding wheel.

The diagram illustrates the internal components of the watch movement, including the mainspring, the gear train, the escapement, and the balance wheel. The diagram is a top-down view of the movement, showing the arrangement of the various parts. The diagram is a technical drawing, and it is used to show the internal structure of the watch movement. The diagram is a valuable tool for watchmakers and engineers, as it provides a clear and detailed view of the internal components of the watch movement.
