a. Attachment for the 100-mm howitzer. M24.4, is used and adapted in the form of fused composite rounds of standard construction. In standard construction, the fuzed projectile is seated loosely in the neck of the cartridge case containing the primer and propelling charge; the round is locked into the weapon as a unit. The propelling charge of standard construction usually is checked into sections, to permit adjustment in the field for zero firing. However, in the M24.4-T, round, which is a special type, the propelling charge is not adjustable. A complete round includes all the components required to fire a howitzer shot.

Each complete record of authorship information is a specific posting as assigned an A.I.C. symbol. These symbols are published in GRID 1 MJA1's.

h. Interchangeability. Assumptions for the MEA-1 functions differ from the corresponding ones for the ME-1 functions only with respect to propelling charges. Whereas the adjustable charges for the MEA-1 functions are made up of seven sections, ME-1 functions usually have a six-section charge of quick-firing powder. However, the ME-1 high-explosive rounds for the ME-1 functions are suitable standard for use in the MEA-1 functions, and can be fired thereon by applying suitable corrections as given in FT 105.9.1 and changes.
