

Figure 1: The overview of activation guided attention in our model. After partitioning the input image into patches of fixed size, the heat map produced by Grad-CAM++ via the auxiliary convolutional model M_{conv} is utilized to choose the major tokens and the minor tokens. Then, for each patch, we perform a linear embedding. The minor tokens (grey tokens) are combined into several representation tokens ($N_f < N_m$) via a fusion network in order to decrease computation while preserving background knowledge. After incorporating positional embedding and fusion embedding into tokens, the output is fed into an efficient transformer encoder.

Utilizing more efficient attention processes, many approaches have been proposed to accelerate the vanilla Transformer [8, 19, 22]. In one direction, the approaches lower the length of input tokens, such as [39, 32] by leveraging low-rank projections. These methods employ complex projection techniques to reduce computing effort while retaining feature representation. Due to the loss of fine-grained token-wise information, however, they frequently perform worse than full attention on tasks requiring fine-grained local knowledge, as evaluated by traditional language [34] and vision [48] benchmarks. In another direction, the approaches also attempt to sparsify the attention matrix using predefined patterns such as [33, 22, 2, 46]. These methods employ powerful inductive biases to enhance computing efficiency and model performance, but the self-attention layer’s capabilities are severely constrained because each token can only attend to a subset of tokens.

To address the above limitations, we present the Convolutional Activation Guided Efficient Vision Transformer (CageViT), which speeds up the vanilla Transformer in both directions. Specifically, as shown in Figures 1 and 2, our CageViT is developed in three steps:

- 1) Before feeding tokens into the linear projection layer, we execute an additional selection and rearrangement step based on the class activation map provided by Grad-CAM++. This process enables the network to identify in advance which patches are significant (major tokens) and which are not (minor tokens).
- 2) After the linear projection of flattened patches, we combine minor tokens into multiple fusion tokens while retaining major tokens. Then, positional and fusion embeddings are added to tokens, and the results are sent to Transformer. This step can preserve the fine-grained information of major tokens, which dominate the classification process because determining the contours and textures is more significant in this task.
- 3) We redesign the attention mechanism to improve communication between major tokens and fusion tokens, therefore facilitating the use of background information contained in fusion tokens to assist with classification. This step permits all major tokens to interact with minor tokens under the supervision of fusion tokens, i.e., they are gated by the fusion tokens, requiring the major token to be aware of the background information.

We thoroughly validate the effectiveness of the proposed CageViT using widely used benchmarks, such as image classification on ImageNet-1K. Compared to the most recent state-of-the-art Vision
