Abstract: The authors assess whether, as predicted, 14-month-old children with autism spectrum disorder (ASD) have a reduced ability to understand the relationship between the location of an object and the location of the person who is looking at it. In Experiment 1, 14-month-old children with ASD were presented with a video of a person looking at an object. The object was either in the same location as the person (e.g., on the table) or in a different location (e.g., on the floor). The children with ASD showed a reduced ability to understand the relationship between the location of the object and the location of the person who is looking at it. In Experiment 2, the children with ASD were presented with a video of a person looking at an object. The object was either in the same location as the person (e.g., on the table) or in a different location (e.g., on the floor). The children with ASD showed a reduced ability to understand the relationship between the location of the object and the location of the person who is looking at it.
