These findings suggest a need for a more comprehensive approach to the management of the environment, one that takes into account the needs of all stakeholders and the long-term sustainability of the system.

This is somewhat a computer-aided ethnography, using the same findings as before. What you can do that hasn't been done again is building your own tree like you can before. Name your sub-nodes after names. Figure out where to put them (if you want). Name them. Use. Change. Delete. And so forth. They spend a lot of time in searching and just adding special keywords instead of just names, and they say that's critical. Naming names. And then adding.
