

What Are Your Thoughts?

Students may have concerns about how students perceived the learning activity and how much time might have been spent on it. As a teacher, you can use this activity right in the classroom to address your students' thoughts. This activity does not require any preparation and the examples of statements may be repeated and changed until the students are able to give you a list of their concerns about your teaching. Addressing the concerns and statements that have been identified may be the teacher's next step. Students can be asked to write:

• How much of the classroom time has the teacher spent on this activity? Is the activity worth a part of the period that is spent, but efforts have not been made to stop and then complete the activity? Should it end for now?

or, if time
is not an issue,
then:

• How do these kinds of activities benefit or harm the progress of the class? Do you remember any previous activities that the students in your class have participated in? How do you think the students in your class would feel about the progress of the class if the activity was not done?

Students may respond to the statements and the statements may be repeated until the students are able to give you a list of their concerns about the activity. The statements may be repeated until the students are able to give you a list of their concerns about the activity. The statements may be repeated until the students are able to give you a list of their concerns about the activity.

Students may respond to the statements and the statements may be repeated until the students are able to give you a list of their concerns about the activity. The statements may be repeated until the students are able to give you a list of their concerns about the activity.

Students may respond to the statements and the statements may be repeated until the students are able to give you a list of their concerns about the activity. The statements may be repeated until the students are able to give you a list of their concerns about the activity.

1. If the statements are repeated until the students are able to give you a list of their concerns about the activity, then the statements may be repeated until the students are able to give you a list of their concerns about the activity.
2. If the statements are repeated until the students are able to give you a list of their concerns about the activity, then the statements may be repeated until the students are able to give you a list of their concerns about the activity.
