

NAMING ACIDS

The word acid evokes a sense of fear, just in and of itself. But, there should be no fear when naming an acid.

There are two types of acids we will be naming:

1. Binary (meaning two)
2. Oxyacid (meaning oxygen is present)

There are specific rules for both. The hardest part is identify what type of acid you have first. The easiest way is to first identify you have an acid (remember that ALL acids start with H in front), and the next is to look for what that H is bonding to, meaning the anion, or negative part of the acid.

BINARY ACIDS

With a binary acid, the H will be bonded to a non-metal element, like chlorine or bromine. This type of acid DOES NOT HAVE OXYGEN PRESENT IN THE FORMULA. A few of examples are listed below:

- HCl
- HBr
- HI

To name a binary acid there is a specific formula that is followed:

1. Use the prefix hydro +
2. Root of the anion's name +
 - Trick:
 - phosphorous: phosphor- is the root
 - sulfur: sulfur- is the root
3. The suffix -ic

Let's try to name some of those types of acids using this formula:

• Example:

• HCl:

• hydro + chlor (root of chlorine) + ic = hydrochloric acid

- HBr: _____ + _____ + _____ = _____
- HI: _____ + _____ + _____ = _____
- H₂S: _____ + _____ + _____ = _____
- HF: _____ + _____ + _____ = _____

So, remember, binary acids have only two elements: hydrogen and a non-metal.
