Figure 5. Scatter plot of the predicted values of the first 10 principal components (PCs) of the 100 variables of the 100-dimensional data set. The first 10 PCs are plotted on the x-axis, and the remaining 90 PCs are plotted on the y-axis. The plot shows a clear separation between the first 10 PCs and the remaining 90 PCs, indicating that the first 10 PCs capture most of the variance in the data.

These two equations define the addition of two operators as well as the multiplication of two operators – a useful mathematical device to formalise the relationship between two operators. The second equation is commutative – a change in the order of the operators does not change the product – as you might expect from a scalar. The first, however, is non-commutative – a change in the order of the operators changes the product, as you might expect from a vector. Substituting the first equation for the product into the second equation, the second equation can be re-written:

1. "What results through absorption in light?" Energy
2. "What other physical property is altered by light?" Temperature
3. "What happens to the molecules of a substance when it is heated?" Molecules vibrate
4. "What is the difference between kinetic and potential energy?" None
5. "What is the difference between kinetic and potential energy?" None
6. "What is the difference between kinetic and potential energy?" None
7. "What is the difference between kinetic and potential energy?" None
8. "What is the difference between kinetic and potential energy?" None
9. "What is the difference between kinetic and potential energy?" None
10. "What is the difference between kinetic and potential energy?" None
