The weight of his family stood upon him, an inheritance begging to be taken, as if it were taunting him. The townspeople mock him, calling him the 'bastard's son'. He closed his hands into a fist. He had not only failed his people, but also himself. A tap on his shoulder; screaming, shouting, but it was as if the words were removed, and only fear remained. He lifted his head, facing the window. A monstrous projectile was coming his way. Frozen with fear, he stared at the flaming rock, wondering if it would hit him. He blinks, half the wall has crumbled, the rock being halfway through it and still traveling. Only the sound of the light breeze on young birch trees make a noise as it crashes in. He feels the pain before it had even struck him. He looks back down at his hands, which now lay wide open and empty, just like his feelings. Death has come, but yet, he feels very much alive. A prominent jaw curved gracefully around and the strength of his neck showed in the twining cords of muscle that shaped his entire body; strong arms, bold thighs and calves, a firm chest and abdomen, but all that was covered by a misleading frame. He dusts his hands off as he put the box down, wanting to remove the mark of his work. Once ashamed of his career which he hid from his family, he now presents it as a 'side' job, but knows in-fact, that this was the only job he could get. He had wished he became a knight, one who protected the king and followed the rule of chivalry, but was restricted with the life he grew up in. He looked over to the run-down counter his boss was sitting at, smoking his long degraded cigar, which he never seems to replace. Typical, always lounging around while I do all the work, he thought. He makes for the door, if you could even still call it that. The paint has long worn off and the jagged edges always ready to rip into your skin. With carefulness, he pushes the door and is
