

If these airlines were operating in a non-collusive environment, they are forced to consider the actions of each other. The Nash equilibrium applies game theory to this interdependence. If firms cooperate on pricing, they will all be better off. If firms work for their own self-interest, everyone ends up worse off. This is due to the kinked demand curve, as shown below. When all firms sell at P_1 , demand for airline seats is relatively elastic. Therefore, if one airline drops its price, consumers will react. This can cause a price war to take place, as all airlines will drop their price. Due to this price rigidity, it is in the best interests of all the airlines to keep their price the same. If one airline raises its price, it will lose customers in the elastic portion of the demand curve above point Z, and thus will lose market share. If the airline lowers its price, all of the other airlines will do so too, and they will all now be in the inelastic portion of the demand curve below point Z, most likely losing profits for everyone.

These airlines should not lower their price, but to gain more market share they can engage in non-price competition in order to attract more customers. For example, these airlines could compete on flying routes offered, onboard services offered, food quality, decor and advertising.

While competition for these airlines can lead to price wars and decreased profits, there are some benefits to competing. Competition might lead to lower prices for consumers. Competition also can encourage innovation which brings differentiation and greater variety of choices for consumers. For example, Samsung and Apple spend great
