

Experiments

A researcher wants to conduct an experiment investigating what effect stress has on concentration. The author should evaluate an appropriate procedure to investigate this (20 marks)

Description (20 marks)	Evaluation (20 marks)
☐ Type of experiment ☐ IV and DV (open situation) There will give opportunity to concentration ☐ Procedures – what will give participants what feedback, timings, controls ☐ Experimental design (independent, repeated, matched pairs) ☐ Sampling method and sample	☐ Validity of experiment – high there is ecological validity? ☐ Validity of the DV – is it a realistic measure of concentration? ☐ Internal level experimental variables (experimental validity) ☐ Practice effects/ demand characteristics participant variables relating to the experimental design are there any? ☐ Reliability of the methods, included timings, same concentration task, same results etc. ecological internal validity

- ❑ To investigate the effect of stress on concentration a lab experiment can be conducted. This will ensure that extraneous variables such as time of day and temperature of the room can be controlled. However, this means that the long-term validity of participants will mean that concentration held in a controlled artificial setting, this means that the findings on concentration cannot be generalised to normal life setting. This example focusing on music as focus.
- ❑ The DV would be if participants listen to music and there are an effect as if they listen to no music whilst completing the task. The DV would be the number of words participants correctly recall (out of 10) in their word search. The experimental design would be repeated measures as participants will take part in both conditions and the number of words identified will be compared. Using a repeated measures design will mean that a different word search will need to be used in each condition for ecological validity, as if participants used the same in each they would be better the second time round which would reduce the validity of the results. Participants' variables will not affect the validity of results as the same participants will be doing both conditions. Counterbalancing will be used to reduce order effects further.
- ❑ Participants will be invited to do the task individually in a classroom. They will be asked to sign (anonymous) consent and given 5 mins to calmly acclimatise to the room as they read what listening to music, or no music. There will be 10 participants selected at the opportunity sampling from Collins's college. The validity will be high as standardised procedure will be used i.e. the participants will listen to the same music, and the same word searches will be given. I need to compare their task. The task will not cause participant stress and concentration will be ensured.
