Richard David Jurd,1997 Principles of Animal Biology (Classic Reprint) A. Franklin Shull,2018-03-19 Excerpt from Principles of Animal Biology Thus histology deals with the grouping of cells of a given kind into masses or layers called tissues The epidermis of the skin is composed of cells of the same general kind grouped together it is therefore a tissue Muscle and bone are tissues as are also tendons many glands and the components of the nervous system Cytology contrariwise is concerned with the minute components of cells the parts of the nucleus the minute structure of the living matter the nature of cell organs and the like Embryology has to do with the young or developmental stages of animals When it is purely descriptive dealing only with the structures of these young stages not with the processes going on in them it is morphological in its nature In creating subdivisions of zoology the several morphological branches mentioned in the preceding paragraphs have occasionally been elevated to equal rank with the divisions described below but Since they do not differ in principle all being concerned with structure it seems better to combine all of them under the Single head morphology Morphology is historically the oldest of the divisions of zoology Since in early times practically all that was known of animals was their structure About the Publisher Forgotten Books publishes hundreds of thousands of rare and
