

Environmental Valuation in Indonesia Implication for forest policy, legal liability and state losses estimates

David Phelan, Bambang Hariyanto, Anna Christina Saugis and Ahmad Darmawan

Introduction

Empirical approaches provide a wide and complex range of goods and services to individuals and communities. These diverse environmental values include economic values related to environmental quality, recreation and amenity values, aesthetic and scientific values, biodiversity and habitat, and values associated with biodiversity and ecosystem services, eg, hydrological, pollution and climate regulation, security, recreation and tourism. Natural and environmental valuation research includes empirical and theoretical values.

There are growing efforts to quantify and value natural values in forest ecosystems and forests. These values can be used to inform state risk analysis, decision making and assessment of costs and benefits of actions. They can also be used to estimate damages from environmental damage.

When ecosystems are damaged or degraded, the impacts on natural resources, biodiversity and ecosystem services can represent huge losses to the local society and worldwide on a global scale. For example, Murray King (2000) and Murray King et al (2002), for example, Murray King (2000) estimated that in 2000 Indonesia had about 1000 billion tons of forest logging in 2000. The Indonesian State Budget approved in 2000 and allocated resources to State Forest Management including in that year around 100 billion Rupiah (100 billion US dollars) for 2000. The value of natural resources in forest damage is environmentally related to magnitude of damage (eg, Murray King et al 2002).

Logging related to forest environmental damage represents a challenge of research and policy development (Phelan and Hariyanto 2002). The valuation of environmental damage can be done in a number of ways, such as State logging related to forest environmental damage, biodiversity and ecosystem services, forest management, and biodiversity. The potential for forest damage, however, has the potential to investigate potential forest environmental damage, which can be done in a number of ways and various methods for ecosystem valuation and valuation. This research focuses on the forest damage case following the forest sector of Indonesia. The forest damage case is a growing number of forests are being affected in various and value these forests in complete environmental governance (eg, Phelan and Hariyanto, 2002, p. 2004).

Box 1. Diverse types of environmental values

Environmental values include physical and complex sets of values that can be conceptualized as a number of uses for a resource (Murray King 2000, 2002).

- Direct use values: recreation, education, information, recreation and tourism.
- Indirect use values: climate regulation, flood prevention, water quality, erosion control, and nitrogen fixation.
- Non-use values: existence value, bequest value, and option value.
- Ecological values: biodiversity and ecosystem services.

These goods, services and values are provided to their consumers in ecological systems, with the provision of use benefits to them and to the benefit of their future. The benefits of environmental values are different from other environmental values (Phelan and Hariyanto 2002). These values are provided to their consumers and to their future generations. These values are provided to their consumers and to their future generations. These values are provided to their consumers and to their future generations. These values are provided to their consumers and to their future generations.

Indonesia is among the countries making a transition from the State environmental damage and in 2001 to a market-based approach for the forest sector (Phelan and Hariyanto 2002). There is growing recognition with its application in the 2004 budget system of 1 billion US dollars. Despite growing attention to the forest sector, which has the potential to investigate the damage to the forest.

Environmental valuation efforts are also involving in various other countries. For example, several countries are providing independent (grass-roots) efforts to assess
