Only Yesterday

Before contrasting American society based on the book, let us first look at what life was like in the 1920s. War loomed, the US faced a tough time in the economy, the workforce was in shamble, drinking, men profited from the prohibition of alcohol and drugs as well as the terror people faced due to their race or religion. First to mention in this paper is the role and status of women. The role of women shifted as they now entered the workforce and moved away from the housewife status. "Women were slowly becoming emancipated from routine to "live their own lives" as quoted directly from the book goes to show how the women of that time had come to be their person which affected other areas of life. The houses were being built smaller; the advancement of technology meant that things around the house could be easier completed. At this time the creation of the electric washer and electric irons was said to be in almost every household. They made pushes to be more involved to be in government offices but as it was said in the book was very rare to happen. A shift in how intercourse was looked upon changed for young and slightly older women. Nevertheless, there was an unmistakable and rapid trend away from the old American code toward a philosophy of sex relations and marriage wholly new to the country: toward a feeling that the virtues of chastity and fidelity had been rated too highly, that there was something to be said for what Mrs. Bertrand Russell defined as "the right, equally shared by men and women, to free participation in sex experience," that it was not necessary for girls to deny themselves this right before marriage or even for husbands and wives to do so after marriage. It was in acknowledgment of the spread of this feeling that Judge Lindsay proposed, in 1927, to establish "companionate marriage" on a legal basis.

The course of sex before marriage had started to seize and more and more the sensation of raw sex trapped more people. It ran rampant with people; it came as a shock to some men how eagerly some women would talk about being with other men with that being just kissing or even more. One man states "I've kissed dozens of men. I suppose I'll kiss dozens more". The housewife was learning to telephone her shopping orders, to get her clothes ready-made and spare herself the rigors of dress-making, to buy a vacuum cleaner and emulate the lovely carefree girls in the magazine advertisements who banished dust with such delicate fingers. Women were slowly becoming emancipated from routine to "live their own lives." With these changes in society the rates of marriage and divorces shifted, the amount of outright infidelity among married couples, one is again without reliable data, the private relations of men and women being happily beyond the reach of the statistician. The divorce rate, however, continued its steady increase; for every 100 marriages there were 8.8 divorces in 1910, 13.4 divorces in 1920, and 16.5 divorces in 1928--almost one divorce for every six marriages. There was a corresponding decline in the amount of disgrace accompanying divorce. In the urban communities men and women who had been divorced were now socially accepted without question.

The labor force field both men and women but saw issues with underpayment and unfair treatment of workers. A good quote to show how the labor force is "For this national panic there was a degree of
