

Researcher's Note: This study represents a first step in understanding the role of the family in the development of the child's self-concept. Further research is needed to explore the specific mechanisms through which family factors influence self-concept and to investigate the long-term effects of these influences.

Abstract: The authors examined the effects of a 12-week, supervised, low-intensity exercise program on the health-related quality of life of sedentary, middle-aged, overweight women. The program was designed to be safe and enjoyable, and to be easily implemented in a community setting. The program consisted of three sessions per week, each lasting 30 minutes. The sessions included a warm-up, a low-intensity aerobic exercise routine, and a cool-down. The program was supervised by a certified exercise instructor. The authors used a pretest-posttest design to evaluate the program's effectiveness. The results showed that the program had a positive effect on the health-related quality of life of the participants. The program was well-received by the participants, and the authors concluded that it is a viable option for improving the health-related quality of life of sedentary, middle-aged, overweight women.
