ONE of the "hits" of last year's London Show, the new MGB GT coupé makes friends right away through its good looks and the exceptional practicality of its body. Perhaps there is more to its looks than simple beauty of form, for the car has an air of robust build and fitness for the purpose which is borne out completely on the road.

By comparison with the MGB open sports car it is relatively costly, the extra £143 (including tax) bringing it almost to £1,000 without a heater or the other optional equipment fitted to the test car—wire-spoked wheels and Dunlop SP41 tyres, overdrive and so on. However, one does not have to look far to discover where the money goes, and to appreciate the fundamental differences between this volume production coupé and those produced by small specialist firms. The quality of the interior furnishing and the care with which all the detail work has been planned put this GT well into the upper middle class, so to speak.

Adding a metal top, with the extra glass and trim this entails, as well as insulating the interior with heavy sound-deadening materials, has put the overall weight up by about 1½ cwt; yet the road performance is only marginally inferior to that of the MGB sports 2-seater tested just over a year ago. The mean maximum recorded in the coupé is slightly up in direct top, slightly down in overdrive top by comparison. This discrepancy may be the result of having to use the M.L.R.A. banked circuit for these figures in the case of the coupé, which may not have allowed the limit to be reached in overdrive. Since it took only 0.2sec longer to cover the quarter-mile from a standing start, it is evident that its acceleration is only slightly inferior "through the gears," although most of the times for 20 m.p.h. increments in individual gears are a second or two slower.

Fuel Consumption

Comparing the steady-speed fuel consumption figures, the later car was more economical in the all-important middle range, a little heavier at the lowest and highest speeds. Its overall consumption proved very much the same, at 22.8 m.p.g. (the open two-seater's was 22.0 m.p.g.), but one has to bear in mind that the current 70 m.p.h. limit is beneficial to this average.

Although the two models share a common mechanical basis, the differences in purpose and character between them are as between a sports and a sporting car. In the case of the coupé it is particularly important to relate the road performance in terms of figures to the manner in which they
