A secondary containment and water remediation system for the safe compliant storage of creosote impregnated timber utility poles.

Capture Green has worked closely with WPD to design a pole storage system that ensures it meets its corporate, social and regulatory responsibilities by preventing creosote contaminants from entering the environment. The system has also been designed to work to the specific requirements of the site.

Secondary containment and water remediation system for the safe compliant storage of creosote impregnated timber utility poles.

The secondary containment installation comprises of two 135m² (9x15m) storage bays that join end-to-end. Both bays are hydraulically linked. The containment areas have been formed with a selection of resilient impermeable and puncture-resistant membrane materials, on an area of stabilised land capable of withstanding the loads subjected by a quantity of stored distribution poles.

Situated at the centre of the two bays, buried beneath the final level of pea shingle reinstatement, is a water retention area, also known as a sustainable (urban) drainage system (SUDS). This is essentially a void created below the ground that enables large volumes of water to be stored before processing or natural ground percolation occurs. Capture Green Ltd integrate this feature to alleviate the burden on the remediation system during heavy rainfall and flash flooding. The retention area slows the drainage process down, ensuring the remedial chamber has time to process contaminated surface water.

A stilage is formed in each bay to prevent excessive movement of stored poles. The stilage comprises of driven vertical timber posts that are held in place with structural concrete. Timber laterals are bolted between the uprights and these form bearers that the stored poles sit on top of. The laterals timbers not only spread content weight but also keep the load off the ground. This brings a number of benefits in areas like water flow, logistics, and protecting the liner by lifting the load off the bed of the site. HDPE top hat sleeves are formed around timber uprights and fused to the lined base to seal the joint between the two components.
