The U.S. Air Force relies on the GPS to support its space-based strategy. GPS-enabled aircraft, such as the B-2 Spirit, can fly precision routes, drop bombs with centimeter accuracy, and identify and track targets. The Department of Defense has established standards for equipment used in conflict to help ensure they work in adverse conditions for high-precision, time-critical, and self-sufficient. Our technology can provide a strong performance, with accuracy as high as 10 degrees, better than the better of any available GPS. The U.S. Air Force relies on GPS to support its space-based strategy, and we plan to continue to develop and improve GPS technology to support the Department of Defense's mission.
