Abstract: While most of the available literature on adolescent substance use centers on the highest numbers of substance-related deaths among adolescents and young adults, relatively little attention has been paid to the role of the family in the development and maintenance of these behaviors. This paper examines the role of the family in the development and maintenance of adolescent substance use, with a particular focus on the role of the family in the development and maintenance of adolescent substance use. The paper reviews the literature on the role of the family in the development and maintenance of adolescent substance use, with a particular focus on the role of the family in the development and maintenance of adolescent substance use.
