“Do I have to read that now, Mr. B.? Can’t I just help you clean out the hamster cage or somethin’?”

—Billy, age nine, struggling reader

What do Thomas Edison, Albert Einstein, Woodrow Wilson, Nelson Rockefeller, Hans Christian Andersen, George Patton, Galileo, Leonardo da Vinci, Michelangelo, Winston Churchill, and Tom Cruise have in common? These notable individuals were all dyslexic. Each struggled in his own way to master the art of reading.

One of the most difficult aspects of teaching is watching a child struggle with learning to read. Early in my teaching career, I was given a class of 30 second- and third-grade struggling readers. My class was designated a Chapter 1 classroom, and most students had serious reading difficulties. A few students were getting extra help from the Resource Room teacher, but most of them received all their instruction from me and my teaching partner, a highly skilled veteran teacher. The range of abilities in the class was broad. Matthew was a nonalphabetic reader with almost no sight-word knowledge; Bradley had severe motor-coordination problems that hampered his ability to form letters; Christon couldn’t recall the alphabet; Brian and Ryan had serious behavioral problems; Billy’s learned helplessness and lack of motivation were constant issues; Darlene could read on grade level but had trouble organizing thoughts and ideas in a logical manner; Jason had accurate but labored decoding skills; and the list went on.
