

Student Exploration: Half-life

Background: Although some things change over time, certain things change in predictable ways. For example, radioactive substances naturally decay over time.

A half-life is the amount of time it takes for a substance to change into half of what it was. For example, if you have 100 grams of a substance and its half-life is 10 years, after 10 years you will have 50 grams left. After 20 years, you will have 25 grams left, and so on.

Half-life is a common way to describe how fast something changes over time. It is used in many fields, including science, medicine, and archaeology.
