Meegs, 2016-02-05 What sort of woman is Mrs Biddle In May of 1903 we find the young mother hungry and destitute stranded in a squalid inn on the north coast of France Six days later she's booked into New York's Plaza Hotel with two thousand dollars in her purse. A charitable person might use the word resourceful to describe her. But those encountering her are rarely left feeling particularly charitable. As ruthless as the day is long, this faux duchess of a drowned duchy brooks neither fools nor opposition. Those who stand in her way are crushed utterly, and those who cross her well, who better to judge than her own husband. We may well ask ourselves as Biddle did then: was she really so vindictive she'd travel 3,000 miles to the sort of jay town she despised with no purpose other than to inflict pain and misery on one she felt had wronged her? Oh yes, was his answer, 10,000 miles on hands and knees and still arrive glad about making the trip. Novella 1: May of 1903. In the dank attic room of a squalid inn on the north coast of France, a young and penniless American woman, only recently recovered from a difficult birth, yearns for home. May God help those who stand in her way. Though her circumstances are such that they might elicit pity, Mrs Biddle neither needs nor wants our sympathy. Nor, after even the briefest acquaintance, are you likely to afford her any. Her yearning for home derives not from a love of friends or family, but rather a compulsion to settle a score. Haughty, arrogant, deceitful, cunning, faithless—these are the words best able to describe her. One moment she's posing as the ruler of an underwater duchy in aid of a con game; the next she's betraying a confederate. With never the slightest feeling of remorse. Meeks* Robert Bruce Stewart, 2012-07-20. Over several months, while pursuing her career, visiting a literary sweat shop, and doing some unusual freelance work at the racetrack, she solves the case through transatlantic correspondence with Scotland Yard.
