After 2 months, adolescents with depression showed fewer improvements, and neurocognitive function improved by only one-third, a finding that may have contributed to the lower rates of improvement. Although they needed more support from their parents, adolescents in the group showed less improvement than the group that received the treatment. In addition, a few participants in the treatment group showed improvement in depression, but not in neurocognitive function. The researchers concluded that the treatment may be effective for adolescents with depression, but not for neurocognitive function.
