The diagram illustrates a power plant system. On the left, a steam turbine is shown connected to a generator. The turbine is driven by steam from a boiler. The generator produces electricity, which is then transmitted through a power line to a building on the right. The building contains a condenser and a cooling tower. The condenser is connected to the turbine, and the cooling tower is connected to the condenser. The cooling tower is shown with water being pumped into it, and steam being released from the top. The diagram is labeled with various components and their connections.
