

care and treatment, as well as the risk factors that must be avoided before such incidents may develop. With the information dissemination, media groups such as social advertising and news programs are coordinated, while printed information serve as reinforcement to create awareness in key community assemblies for better expansion of the campaign to the public (Venzie et al. 2539).

Significantly, the program is an active movement against rising health problem in cardiovascular status. Health promotion and disease prevention strategies are extended to early treatment interventions where individuals are comprehensively educated on what to do in cases of cardiovascular emergencies. Fully utilizing the power of health literacy in health campaigns, the use of diverse media categories is a tactical move to expand the program to wider demographic locations. In such events, the community is given the empowered to be involved and act for development progress in cardiovascular health and disease conditions in the process. The advanced learning capacities and awareness can save communities from worsening health risks. Although community citizens are main target of the program, this can also extend to workplace settings, where community employees are encouraged in taking part with the program to preserve their health well beings (Venzie et al. 2539). The partnership for community health improvement in cardiovascular health is interesting for it attempts to resolve the primary cause of death in community settings, cardiovascular diseases. The emphasis of health literacy expanded model in understanding and reaching out to the cognitive and psychomotor capacities of citizens makes it ideal in promoting cardiovascular health. Through the wide-ranging information campaign and training, control in managing health is conveyed back to community settings—where all basic health activities should be initially initiated.
