X2. RESULTS OF AN INTERLABORATORY TEST COMPARING MICROINDENTATION HARDNESS TESTING USING MANUAL AND AUTOMATED MEASURING SYSTEMS

X2.1 Introduction

X2.1.1 An interlaboratory test program was conducted to develop information comparing Knoop and Vickers microindentation hardness tests made with measurements using automated image analysis systems and by the standard manual procedure. Four ferritic specimens were used in the test program (see Research Report RR-104-1000).¹⁰

X2.2 Scope

X2.2.1 This interlaboratory test program provides information on measurements of the same indentations made by different laboratories using two different measuring methods according to the procedures of Practice E693.

X2.3 Procedure

X2.3.1 The test was conducted under controlled conditions using loads of 100 gf and 300 gf. Ten Knoop and ten Vickers indentations were made for each load, a total of 40 indentations. The participants in the test program measured the same indentations on the four specimens. Seven laboratories measured the specimens using both procedures. The results of these seven sets of measurements were used for the analysis. The Knoop indentations on specimen C1 were too long for accurate measurements to be made by one lab, hence, only six sets of measurements were made on this specimen. Near the end of the test program, specimen B1 was lost in shipping; thus only six sets of measurements were made on this specimen.

X2.4 Reproducibility

X2.4.1 Reproducibility concerns the variability between individual test results obtained within a single laboratory by a single operator with a specific set of test apparatus. For both the manual and automated measurements, the reproducibility interval increased with specimen hardness and decreasing test force. Tables X2.1-X2.4, and Figs. X2.1-X2.4. For equivalent testing conditions, the reproducibility interval for automated measurements was slightly larger than for manual measurements.

X2.5 Reproducibility

X2.5.1 Reproducibility deals with the variability between single test results obtained by different laboratories, applying the same test methods to the same or similar test specimens. For both the manual and automated measurements, the reproducibility interval increased with specimen hardness and decreasing test force. Tables X2.1-X2.4, and Figs. X2.1-X2.4. For equivalent testing conditions, the reproducibility interval for automated measurements was slightly larger than for manual measurements.

X2.6 Comparisons

X2.6.1 Neither Practice E693, nor any other ASTM standard, deals with comparing test results of a single property made by two different test methods. Hence, it is not possible to statistically and accurately compare the hardness measurements made by the manual and automated procedures. However, this information is graphically represented for comparative purposes. Figs. X2.5-X2.8.
