Discussion: This study found that the relationship between age and gross world productivity was negative. This suggests that older workers are less productive than younger workers. This finding is consistent with the literature on the decline in productivity with age. However, the relationship between age and gross world productivity was not significant for all countries. This suggests that the relationship between age and gross world productivity may vary across countries. The results of this study have important implications for policy. If the relationship between age and gross world productivity is negative, then policies that encourage older workers to remain in the workforce may be beneficial. This could be done through measures such as providing training and education opportunities for older workers, and creating flexible work arrangements that allow older workers to continue to work at a reduced pace. Additionally, policies that encourage younger workers to enter the workforce may also be beneficial. This could be done through measures such as providing training and education opportunities for young workers, and creating incentives for young workers to enter the workforce. Overall, the results of this study suggest that there is a need for policies that encourage older workers to remain in the workforce and young workers to enter the workforce.

Disclaimer: The Energy price controls described above are hypothetical. They do not represent any actual policy proposal or any commitment by the U.S. government. The U.S. government has no authority to control the price of energy.
