

Each aspiring graduate business school student has a unique perspective on how they will use their MBA to reach their career goals, and on what kind of MBA program will best meet their needs.

MBA admissions offices frequently provide detailed information about their programs, including average class sizes, faculty or school specializations, average undergraduate GPAs and GMAT scores of students, job placement rates and average starting salaries of graduates. As you consider which MBA program will work best for you, some of this information may help you make a decision about where to apply. You may wish to apply to programs with highly competitive admissions as well as programs that have lower barriers to entry to make sure you have a range of options.

Most full time programs allow you the opportunity to specialize in fields like Finance, Marketing, Strategy or Entrepreneurship. Some programs offer very specific concentrations in industry sectors, such as real estate, health care, or non-profit management. Take time to identify schools that match your interests. Graduate schools of business are often not good places to 'find yourself'; consider clarifying what you want from your MBA program before you apply. Schools may have strong reputations in certain industries; ask the business school's career center about where the majority of graduates find employment.
