

Chapter 11: Understanding Institutions: Family

11.1 What Shapes Families?

- Families are groups of people who take responsibility for meeting one another's needs. What needs families meet has changed over time; families were once sites of economic production and political connection building but now offer emotional comfort. Our definitions of family are institutionalized through social policy, law, and our shared beliefs.

11.1 Key Terms

- family: A group of people who take responsibility for meeting one another's needs
- nuclear family: Parents and their children
- institutionalized: Encoded in laws, policies, and widely accepted practices

11.2 Changing Families Across History

- Our sociological imaginations help us identify social factors that influence family life. Some of the key social factors include slavery, industrialization, social class, technological innovations (such as the car, birth control, and mobile phones), social movements, and gender roles. Since the 1970s, social factors such as deindustrialization, the decline of the family wage, and several social movements have led to change in norms around marriage, cohabitation, and births outside of marriage. Same-sex marriages are now recognized but the overall marriage rate has declined, while cohabitation and births to unmarried mothers have increased.
